

A
A 0
0
0
7
9
4
2
4
5
1

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

EXERCISES

AT THE

UNVEILING OF THE STATUE

OF

THOMAS BRACKETT REED,

AT PORTLAND, MAINE,

AUGUST THIRTY-FIRST,

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND TEN.

STEPHEN BERRY COMPANY, PRINTERS,
PORTLAND, MAINE.

EXERCISES.

550683

ON April 4, 1905, a resolution looking to the erection in Portland of a monument to the memory of Thomas Brackett Reed was introduced into the Common Council of the city by Mr. Luther B. Roberts, then one of its members, and was at once adopted by both boards of the city government and approved by the Mayor. A committee, consisting of William L. Cobb, George A. Dow and Charles Carr on the part of the Aldermen, and John W. Turner, Jr., Luther B. Roberts, Frank D. Marshall, George W. Beyer, Arthur E. Craig, on the part of the Common Council, was appointed to carry into execution the terms of the resolution.

On the nineteenth of May, 1905, a meeting of citizens to form the Thomas Brackett Reed Memorial Association was held in the Common Council Rooms and the following gentlemen, John Marshall Brown, Augustus G. Paine, George M. Seiders, Henry Deering, George E. Bird, Charles F. Flagg, George H. Weeks, John C. Small, were joined as associates with the special committee of the city council, and it was voted that all present be made members of this general committee.

Thereupon a voluntary organization was formed with Joseph W. Symonds as President.

Col. Augustus G. Paine of New York made a large contribution to the fund himself and secured large subscriptions in New York, and the response to the circular of the Association in Portland was generous and prompt.

During the legislative session of 1907, a charter, drawn by Hon. George M. Seiders, was granted to the Association. It was approved on March 20, 1907, and its officers elected.

CHARTER.

AN ACT TO INCORPORATE THE THOMAS BRACKETT REED MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Legislature assembled, as follows:

SECTION 1. Joseph W. Symonds, George M. Seiders, John Marshall Brown, John C. Small, Frank D. Marshall, Luther B. Roberts and George W. Beyer, all of Portland, State of Maine, and Augustus G. Paine of New York, State of New York, or such of them as may by vote accept this charter, with their associates, successors and assigns, are hereby made a body corporate to be known as the Thomas Brackett Reed Memorial Association, and as such shall be possessed of all the powers, privileges and immunities and subject to all the duties and obligations conferred on corporations by law, except as herein specified and provided.

SECTION 2. The corporation hereby created shall be located at Portland, County of Cumberland, State of Maine, and may have its office for the transaction of business in said City of Portland.

SECTION 3. The business and purpose of this corporation are as follows: To erect a suitable memorial to the late Thomas Brackett Reed in said City of Portland, and to this end, to solicit, collect and receive moneys and property, and to invest the same; to borrow money, contract loans and accept in trust bequests and gifts of every description, all of which moneys and property are to be used and expended for the purposes of this association and for no other.

The amount of the capital which this corporation may acquire and hold shall not exceed one hundred thousand dollars.

SECTION 4. The officers of this corporation shall be a president, one or more vice-presidents, treasurer, board of directors, secretary and an executive committee, and such other officers and committees as the by-laws may prescribe or the board of directors may create. The number of vice-presidents, board of directors and executive committee shall be fixed by the by-laws.

SECTION 5. The corporate powers of this corporation shall be vested in the board of directors, a majority of whom shall be residents of this state, and who shall be elected, as also all other officers and committees provided, at the first meeting held by the incorporators, and shall hold office for one year and until their successors are chosen. All other committees, when required, may be appointed by the executive committee. The business affairs of this corporation shall be entrusted to the executive committee, to be elected from the board of directors.

SECTION 6. The executive committee shall have authority to collect, invest, secure and manage the moneys and property of the association; to make all necessary contracts, which shall be signed and executed by the president and treasurer, and generally to oversee and manage the affairs of the corporation.

SECTION 7. This corporation being intended for the sole purpose of erecting a suitable memorial to the late Thomas Brackett Reed and matters incidental thereto, and the moneys and property collected for that purpose being wholly gratuitous gifts, it is provided that neither the corporation nor the moneys held by it, shall be subject to taxation or charges under either the general or special laws of this state.

SECTION 8. All persons who have contributed or who may hereafter contribute funds or property for the purpose of this corporation shall be entitled to membership therein, and no member shall be liable to assessment or corporate debts beyond the amount of his subscription or contribution.

SECTION 9. Upon the erection of a memorial as herein provided, this corporation may convey and deliver the same to the city of Portland and said city may take it over, and shall thereafter carefully preserve, protect and maintain it.

SECTION 10. The first meeting of this corporation may be called by one of its said associates, by giving in hand or by mail four days' written notice to each associate, stating the time and place of said meeting. At such meeting by-laws may be adopted, officers elected as herein provided and other business transacted.

SECTION 11. All acts of the association heretofore performed and carried out or in the process of being carried out, are hereby authorized and legalized in so far as they conform with the laws of the state.

SECTION 12. This act shall take effect when approved.

Approved March 20, 1907.

In this corporation the voluntary organization was merged and the results of its labor transferred to the corporation.

It was soon seen that the amount of the subscriptions was entirely adequate for the erection of the monument, and on the eighth day of May, 1908, the contract was made with Mr. Burr C. Miller of Wilkes Barre, Pa., an American sculptor resident in Paris, for the erection of the statue according to a design which he presented.

By the action of the City Government of Portland on the fifth day of August, 1907, the plot of ground on which the statue now stands was "set apart and designated as the site of such monument forever."

On the thirty-first day of August, 1910, the ceremony of unveiling the statue took place according to the following order of exercises:

ORDER OF EXERCISES.

Hon. Joseph W. Symonds, LL.D., President of the Association, presiding

Music—American Overture

CHANDLER'S BAND

Invocation

Rev. WILLIAM H. FENN, D. D.

Address—The History of the Statue

Colonel AUGUSTUS G. PAINE

Address—Thomas Brackett Reed in Early Life

PRESIDENT OF THE ASSOCIATION

Music—Pilgrim Chorus, from Tannhauser

CHANDLER'S BAND

Poem—Tom Reed's School Days

Rev. EDWARD N. POMEROY

Oration—Thomas Brackett Reed

Hon. SAMUEL W. MCCALL, LL.D.,
M. C. from Massachusetts

Music—Sextette, from Lucia

CHANDLER'S BAND

Unveiling of the Statue

THOMAS REED VALENTINE,
Grandson of Thomas Brackett Reed

Introduction of the Sculptor, Mr. Burr C. Miller

Presentation of the Statue

PRESIDENT OF THE ASSOCIATION

Acceptance of the Statue

HON. CHARLES A. STROUT,
Mayor of Portland

Benediction

REV. ASA DALTON, D. D.

Rev. William H. Fenn, D. D., of Portland, offered the prayer.

Colonel Paine was introduced by the President of the Association :

The history of the statue will now be given by the Chairman of the Committee in charge of the unveiling, who has been, himself alone, from the beginning to the end a large part of the Thomas Brackett Reed Memorial Association, an early school-boy friend of Mr. Reed in the old Portland High School, a most intimate, valued and life-long friend, who in the past has not been forgotten in Portland, notwithstanding his home has been elsewhere for many years. In this statue of his friend, we shall all have a new reason, an ample reason, never to forget him, Colonel Augustus G. Paine of New York.

COL. PAINE'S ADDRESS.

After the passing away of the dear friend whom we all loved, one who honored us with his friendship, and his State and nation by his fidelity and devotion to duty, it seemed fitting that his friends should provide a memorial worthy of him and of the city of his birth, to be placed here.

This sentiment crystallized in the formation of the Thomas Brackett Reed Memorial Association, with Mr. Reed's old schoolmate, classmate and life long friend, Hon. Joseph W. Symonds, its president. With the cordial co-operation of those in charge of Portland's municipal affairs, the work was undertaken. A few of the friends of Mr. Reed were given the opportunity to subscribe to the fund, which was speedily forthcoming, and your committee after a long, careful investigation, awarded the contract to a young American sculptor, who has already achieved distinction, and the result of his uninterrupted work for nearly two years was inspected in Paris by a member of your committee and accepted, and it is gratifying to know that the complete work has received the unqualified approval of the most competent critics in that centre of modern art, the city of Paris, where it has been on exhibition in the Salon while awaiting removal to this city.

The committee takes this opportunity to thank all those who have lent their aid in this undertaking and ventures to hope its work may meet with your approval.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE ASSOCIATION.

The Thomas Brackett Reed Memorial Association will not deny its great disappointment in finding that the President could not attend this ceremony of formally unveiling the statue. Untoward circumstances and the duties of his great office have kept him away.

We can have, therefore, only the satisfaction of knowing that he wished and hoped to be present and the honor to believe he shares with us the regret that he could not come.

But this vast concourse of citizens from all the walks of life—the church, the bar, the profession of medicine, from the many paths of business and pleasure, learning and labor—assembled (one might say) from all parts of the Republic, of itself attests and illustrates, only less strikingly than the presence of the President might do, our country's grateful memory of Mr. Reed's public service, giving rare distinction to the day, investing the occasion and the event with historic interest and charm.

The orator of the day, too, Mr. Reed's personal friend, by his side in the great historic encounters in the national House of Representatives, foremost in the fray, dealing the heaviest blows, with him, at the height of his own lofty public service honors us all by coming to us to speak in commemoration of his great associate now sunk in death.

The national government, perhaps in every branch of it, the Congress, the Courts, the Executive Departments, the Army, the Navy, finds representatives here; among them, the distinguished Secretary of the Navy during the late war, Ex-Governor Long of Massachusetts, in whose many titles of honor and renown his native state always likes to claim a share.

Bowdoin College, too, is present by members of its Faculty and by many graduates, Bowdoin College, which in the old days Mr. Reed so fondly loved, to which more recently he gave faithful allegiance and high service at the college Centennial; one of the professorships in which forever holds his name.

Not only is the new Bowdoin present, but from the Bowdoin of the past come classmates, our Congressman Allen, Came of Alfred, Kendall of Cleveland, Ohio, Major in the regular army, Stubbs of Strong, Maine, men who knew him in college, some of them having journeyed far to express by their presence their personal admiration for him and affectionate respect for his memory; among these Bowdoin men, the rarely accomplished scholar and gentleman, during Mr. Reed's college course our Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory, himself in the flush of early manhood then, before that brilliant military career, familiar to the world for a generation now, had even begun—familiar now, but in the remote future to glow with new light upon the pages of yet unwritten history; before, long before in civil life the highest honors of the Academy and the State, the Presidency of the College, the chief magistracy of Maine, awaited him on the advent of peace; the surviving member of the grave and reverend Bowdoin Faculty of Mr. Reed's time in college, General Chamberlain.

My eyes, too, while I speak, fall upon another Ex-Governor of Maine, present in his honored age under this inclement sky, bringing with him longer Bowdoin memories than any of the rest of us can have, the Honorable Frederick Robie of Gorham.

Our country believed in Mr. Reed while he lived. It is hardly an extravagance to say that in this representative gathering it assembles now to do honor to his memory.

All this is true, but in a special sense what we celebrate to-day is a Portland event. Upon this I hope I may insist for a moment, because it affords the only reason for the brief, preliminary part I am to take in the speaking.

The citizens of Portland may well repeat of Mr. Reed what Rufus Choate said of Daniel Webster at Dartmouth:

“Others mourn and praise him by his more distant and more general titles to fame and remembrance; his supremacy of intellect, his statesmanship of so many years, his eloquence of reason and of the heart, his love of country, incorruptible, conscientious, and ruling every hour and act.”

We come, his neighbors, friends, brethren, "to own a closer tie, to indulge an emotion more personal and more fond," pride and exultation for what he was and what he accomplished mingling with our sorrow for his all too early death.

Mr. Reed's birthplace in Portland, as all know, was next door to Longfellow's. This region of Fore and Hancock Streets in our times has fallen somewhat from its former estate. The beautiful beach of Longfellow's time, along the margin of which Fore Street ran, on which the great waves came tumbling in through the broad ship channel from the open sea, the view extending across the harbor to the islands which, as he says, were the Hesperides of all his boyish dreams, has disappeared. It is a railroad yard now and stately ships, at safe anchorages or in the huge docks, obstruct the sight. The progress of decay has gone far with the buildings upon both the old homesteads. But the birthplaces of the truest and loftiest of American poets and of the American statesman whose memory we are assembled to honor to-day are still there, side by side.

Mr. Reed traced his descent from the first settler upon these lands north of Fore River, and his own words glow with enthusiasm over the great part his ancestor, George Cleeve, played in defending his possessions against rival claimants, Royalist or Puritan, at home and abroad, in the bitter feuds and sharp transitions and vicissitudes of Cromwell's time. Mr. Reed's middle name, Brackett, continues that of an early ancestor, Anthony Brackett, prominent in local history; and from early boyhood until he went to Congress his home was on Brackett Street, within hardly more than a stone's throw from the site of this memorial monument. The spot on which we stand is part of the ancestral Brackett Farm. This Western Promenade was his early playground and always a favorite haunt of his. Here the boy played or dreamed, here the man walked and talked with his friends or mused and thought alone, looking upon the beautiful foreground of the picture across Fore River or over to the Ossipee Hills, one of the outer boundaries of the region he was so long to represent in Congress, or off to the mountains of New Hampshire, "blue with loftiness and distance," or white in the snow and sunlight.

In the Portland High School he first half-awoke from his early dreaming and from a sense of loneliness that I think attended his boyhood, and the slumbering immensity of his native resources became dimly conscious of itself. To the last of his life he was accustomed to speak in a hushed and intense way of what he owed to his severe teacher there, Moses Lyford. He did not forget his obligations to that school, to the strictness of its discipline, and the value of its early associations to him, when he delivered his address at the Portland Centennial in 1886.

The personal religious experience, through which Mr. Reed passed in early youth, should not be overlooked. Under the influence of the brilliant pastor of State Street Church, Mr. Carpenter, he became a convert and united with the church. When he entered college he joined the Bowdoin Praying Circle and the record of his membership still remains. Whatever changes of intellectual belief may have occurred later—of his inmost religious faith I should not venture to speak—it is true, I think, that this experience was not without lasting effect upon his character, that what was vital in it retained its hold upon his mind and heart. The high motive, the pure feeling, the fervor and hope, which the ideals of life—as he caught a glimpse of them then—inspired, left their traces in the serene and lofty rectitude of his life, in its truthfulness to itself and its own best standards. He was at all times intensely thoughtful upon the problems of human destiny. His prize theme at Bowdoin was upon “The Fear of Death.” There was something of the early vision which did not fade into the light of common day; which remained with him always in life and I doubt not in death.

Sometimes when the two things have occurred to my mind, on the one hand the intensity of his passionate nature, on the other hand the exceeding and supreme moral beauty of his life, I have thought of Carlyle’s description of our great northern constellation, Boötes the Hunter, leading his hunting-dogs over the zenith in a leash of sidereal fire from which they cannot break. With Mr. Reed, the passions never broke from his flaming will, disciplined by the patient struggles of boyhood, imbued by personal experience in early youth with the true spirit of the religious life, lingering in its influence through whatever changes or contrasts of later thought and experience.

In Bowdoin College he buried himself in books, absorbed in a passionate reading of all English literature. History, eloquence, philosophy, poetry, novels, dramas, he was familiar with the literature of them all. His reading was so intense and its range so wide, as to cause him to neglect somewhat the regular studies of the college course. He failed of a Junior part—which was then assigned to a few of the best scholars of the Junior class. This event, I think, came to him like a sudden shock, startling him from his wayward wanderings in literature. During the Senior year his recitations were simply marvelous. In Butler's Analogy they were the delight and pride of President Woods and apparently reached his ideal of scholarship. Nothing more could be said for them than that. For President Woods was himself so fine, the resources of his reading and experience, of his knowledge of the world and of books, were so rare, gentle blood, high breeding and fine thought had so wrought their perfect work in him, that his very presence was a discipline and a delight, even as his memory is now. In all the Senior studies Mr. Reed excelled. Moreover, the whole tenor of his college life gave an impression of reserved force, of powers not yet called into action, prophetic of great results in the future. The note that had in it the trumpet-call had not yet been sounded.

I must pass by the years of patient professional study in Portland—a part of the time in the office of our distinguished fellow-townsmen, the Hon. Sewall C. Strout, who hoped to be present to-day—the venture in California, the admission to practice there, his appointment and service in the Navy, his return to Portland at the close of the war, the period of valuable legislative service, his brilliant career as Attorney General, his work as City Solicitor, the ten years—hardly more than that—in which he acquired the high standing at the Bar, which was one of the grounds of the constant and universal admiration and respect for him in Maine. These are but incidents which preceded his election to Congress in the fall of 1876, golden milestones, along which may be traced the whole course of his earlier life. But during these years how deep had the foundation been laid, far below the surface, on which in the future great achievement might surely be wrought, great fame might securely stand.

I am fortunate in being able to speak of Mr. Reed from the intimacies of early childhood. We were boys together, always friends, classmates in school, classmates in college, young lawyers with adjoining offices in the old, happy, careless, briefless days when the expense of repairing the office-chairs which broke down under him, or which betrayed signs of infirmity after he was gone, was a consideration not to be regarded by either of us with entire indifference.

No boyhood ever more glowed with the dream of greatness, of greatness in action, of high conduct and service and usefulness in the world of men. None ever more patiently bided its time, accumulating from all intellectual regions the vast resources which the future was to charge with power. None ever kept its eye fixed more steadily upon the goal or trod the pathway to the goal with firmer or surer step. No boyhood as it passed by ever left behind it a more shining example of truthfulness to itself and to others, of uprightness, virtue, honor, of the sway of high motives and noble sentiments over its whole course. There was no waste of time and no hurry—always leisure for a pleasantry, not infrequently for sarcasm or invective. To a stranger he might seem indifferent or idle, but there was always the aspiring mind and the consciousness of power and if the step was sometimes slow, it was still the step of the giant. When he spoke, the drawl was heavy and languid, perhaps; but from it, as from the idle summer cloud, at any instant the lightning might flash and strike. He was not wealthy; he was poor. But his severe methods brought within his reach all the advantages wealth can afford a young man. He never indulged an extravagance that would cripple his independence or mortgage the labor of tomorrow to make it good. All he wanted of money was to give him opportunity, “opportunity, mightier even than conquerors and prophets"; and self-restraint, self-denial, self-control, a high-minded economy and exactness in expenditure, diligence and industry that never flagged, were the instruments by which he wrung from the narrowness of his situation the golden opportunities of his youth, the prelude and the preparation for the work of manhood.

If there is a boyhood now, familiar as his was with these simpler and sterner virtues, one whose cheek so mantles with the dream of future usefulness to the state, that boyhood, whatever external circumstances or accidents of fortune surround it, attended by wealth or under the stress of poverty, is to his as the true heir, the rightful successor, the lineal descendant.

No account of Mr. Reed's boyhood would be complete without recognizing how deeply it was affected by the influence of William Pitt Fessenden. He was the friend of the great senator's sons. The youngest of them, who was afterwards killed at Manassas, was for a time Mr. Reed's roommate in college. Mr. Reed himself had early attracted the senator's attention, and had received words of personal praise and encouragement from his lips. He had felt the senator's helping hand in college.

In March, 1854, when Reed was fourteen or fifteen years of age, Mr. Fessenden almost immediately upon his entrance into the Senate delivered his speech on the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, in which there was a note of defiance of the South, such as had never been heard in Congress before. His reply to southern senators threatening secession, that, if that was their treasonable purpose, they need not delay on account of anybody at the North, showed that he had broken finally from the traditions of Webster and spoke the new voice of the North. While the gloom of the terrible tragedy approached Mr. Fessenden was at his post in the Senate. During its darkest scenes he was chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and later, at President Lincoln's request, I might almost say command, Secretary of the Treasury. Returning to his place in the Senate after the war was over he exhausted the resources of his learning and genius in the work of reconstruction, and life flowed swiftly from his grasp in the pressure of that terrific emergency. But a more fearful ordeal was still before him. Sitting as Senator, in his office of Judge upon the impeachment of President Johnson, to the dismay of many of his constituents and of his nearest friends through the North, he voted for acquittal. Some of you remember the tumult of wrath and indignation that ensued. All the imprisoned winds were let loose. Men forgot that in that high tribunal Mr. Fessenden was acting judicially; that the question was one of personal judgment and conscience, not of public policy or expediency. The caldron of public discontent—if I may vary the metaphor—was still seething on September 9, 1869, when the great statesman died in his home on State Street, at the same age at which Mr. Reed's life was afterwards to close.

Every step of this great career was followed by Mr. Reed in his boyhood and youth. He always believed Mr. Fessenden to have been the most intellectual man in public life during the period of the Rebellion. A nobler inspiration, a loftier example, no young man could have had. One can hardly overstate the influence of that great career upon the brooding, sensitive, secluded boy, upon the youth whose eyes were just fastening upon the heights of the future.

This was the young man, of endowments and experience such as I have indicated—his boyhood overshadowed by the dim tradition of an ancestor who had acted a strong part in the world of men, his lineage derived from men of influence and prominence in local Colonial history, touched with some regret for the past, for the fallen fortunes of his family (his father having followed the sea as master mariner, but not having been successful as the world counts success), at first somewhat aloof and unfriended, early subjected to severe discipline in school, with pupils in advance of him there whose work he emulated, with those upon the same form with him with whom he made lifelong companionships and friendships, a passionate dream of religion kindling the soul to a vision of its own ideals, opportunity early offering the welcoming hand to genius, the gates of Bowdoin College flying open on golden hinges into lands of enchantment, great powers wakened into sudden action there, manhood ushered in upon a period in our country's history when the clouds of civil strife were black upon the southern sky, when the wrath of the whirlwind and some strange gloom of eclipse seemed to be gathering in the noonday air, and the solid earth to be tremulous with the long roll of the breaking storm, a worthy part acted during that sad fratricidal war, a few years after the war of intense and incessant professional activity and achievement and brilliant official service, important interests committed to his care and fine work done in the legislature of Maine, with many encouraging and stimulating influences about him, but, above all, with William Pitt Fessenden, in the long and bitter crisis giving to his country the costly sacrifice of his genius and his life, for neighbor and friend, Mentor and guide;—

This was the young man, whom in March, 1877, the first district of Maine sent as its representative to the halls of the American Congress, resolved to act a part there worthy of himself and of his native state, useful to the country and the world, and so to snatch power and fame from the summits of human life. What he did there—the dreams of youth assuming form in the solid outline and substance of fact, in strength and stateliness of character, in heroic conduct—what he did there makes part of the fame of our native land now as it will make part of its history forever.

During the exercises a sudden shower had become so threatening that it was deemed advisable not to proceed with the delivery of the poem and oration in the open air, but for this purpose to adjourn to the State Street Church. This was done and after the statue had been unveiled and accepted by the city the poem and oration were there delivered before a crowded audience. They are published here as if delivered according to the regular order of exercises.

TOM REED'S SCHOOL DAYS.

---

BY THE REV. EDWARD N. POMEROY, A BOYHOOD FRIEND.

---

'Tis often said and sung in prose and rhyme,
While justifying an eternal plan ;
Of all the products of the loom of time,
The fairest and most wonderful is man.

'Tis not the semblance we to-day unveil,
'Tis not the scene tradition will recall,
Nor yet the massive bronze that will prevail,—
It is—it is the great original.

His presence dominated hall and street ;
His voice at need rang stormy music then ;
His epigrams we oft and oft repeat ;
We meet and greet no more this man of men.

But faithful memory conducts us back—

To far off scenes of trouble, touched with joy,
Along the lengthened decades' tangled track—

Back to the school room, where we find the boy

Droll is the drawl when, having made his bow,

The new declaimer has the stage and floor ;
And deep the seer's dream revealing now

The houses hushed, the tables on a roar ;

The nation's fierce arena of debate ;

The staying of her gladiators' game ;

The recognition legislators wait ;

A people's plaudits and the world's acclaim.

'Tis in the school room that the strife begins,—

Self against self, with conquest or defeat ;

'Tis here the baser or the nobler wins

When, issue joined, these adversaries meet.

But dauntless, though his first endeavors fail,

And habit, regnant long, resists control ;
Regarding not if ridicule assail,

Ambition's thrill he nurtures in his soul.

No blatant boast of arrogance is here,

Nor prophecy of battles to be won ;
The day is seized and, scorning failure's fear,
The struggle, strenuous and long, is on ;

Wherein, though once impatient of restraint,

He flinched from discipline's refining fire,
He yet shall win, surrendering complaint,
The self-control that subjugates desire.

Regarding loss, in honor's service, gain ;
To one high purpose stubbornly he clings ;
Resists allurements that have heroes slain ;
Nor heeds her song, whatever siren sings.

So, as the scroll of midnight is unrolled,
Some tireless searcher, with illumined eye,
Resolving mysteries the stars enfold,
Lets fate, and chaos, and the hours go by.

The harp of life awakens at his touch ;
The gleam of genius steals into his face ;
He bides his time to gather in his clutch
The long denied ambitions of his race.

Ah, ill for one, the favorite of fate,
Of gifts exalted or a noble name,
Whom sloth and pleasure charm, and enervate,
And bring forgetfulness in place of fame.

But well for him, in cruel fortune brave,
Who molds condition, like the potter's clay ;
Whose wit and wisdom overmatch the grave,
And hold the foe oblivion at bay.

Majestic Shade, where thou abidest now
Beyond defeat, decrepitude, and dust,
Accept thy schoolmate's laurel for thy brow ,
Renown's endowment to the ages trust.

THOMAS BRACKETT REED.

BY HON. SAMUEL W. McCALL, LL.D.

A statue of a human figure, which does not represent a mere abstraction but a real and once breathing man, draws much of its significance from the nature of the forces creating it and also from a fit association with the spot where it is reared. At a time when government is expected to do everything, it is becoming quite too much the fashion to build monuments by law and pay for them by money taken by taxation from the people. The tribute thus rendered involves no special sense of sacrifice on the part of any human being. It is indeed cold compared with that which is paid by voluntary gifts and comes springing from the hearts of the givers. In one of the public squares of Washington stands a figure of Lincoln. It is not striking merely as a work of art but it acquires a beauty and a pathos from the fact that it was reared by many small gifts from men and women whom his immortal Proclamation had made free. It is surely a felicity that the statue of Thomas Brackett Reed which you unveil to-day should have been raised by the free gifts of those who knew and loved him and not from a levy upon any public treasury. Nothing could be happier also than its association with the spot where it is placed. It is ideally fitting that it should stand in the streets where he once played as a boy, in the city where he was born and lived nearly his whole life through and where he now rests from his labors. I imagine you did not have in mind at all the last sentence of that beautiful speech of his spoken here a quarter of a century ago, but how perfectly this occasion seems to respond to it: "Whatever fame great achievements may bestow, whatever honors the world may give, it is ever the most cherished hope of every seeker after fame or fortune to be kindly remembered and lovingly honored on the spot which gave him birth."

It is no common thing for the citizens of a city like this, the commercial capital of a great state, to set up a statue in its streets, and we are now to render some answer to the question, what reason justifies this hour and what is its real meaning. The answer was simpler although the occasion had no greater merit when you were putting up the statue of Longfellow; and it was simpler because of the difference in the nature of their work between a poet and a statesman. The statesman lives in the field of practical controversy, the poet in the realm of ideals. It is not an uncommon fate of poets to be neglected in their life-time and to have their birthdays celebrated in after generations. But the statesman is fêted in his life and too commonly forgotten when he is dead. It is not difficult, I think, to find the reason for this difference. The poet, if he be a real one as yours was, deals not with the shifting conditions of the time but with what Sainte-Beuve called "the eternal humanity." Time takes little from the sweetness of his songs, and ages after he is gone they go as freshly and as warmly to the hearts of men as when they first dropped from his lips. And the genuine poet sings not merely to other ages, but to other countries than his own, and there is a simplicity and a universality to his fame. But the statesman has to do with the complex machinery of the state, never more complex than now, and however ardently he may wish to realize his ideals and fly above the clouds, he may not get too far from the earth without coming suddenly too near it with the vast interests in his keeping, in the collapse of a general ruin. He deals, too, with the shifting sands of popular opinion instead of with the "eternal humanity," and the absorbing issues of to-day are thrust aside by the aggressive issues of to-morrow and are forgotten. Much of his work is blended into the general aggregate of social achievement and does not stand visibly by itself. His fame is less universal since the barriers of patriotism often hedge it in. But yet he richly earns the gratitude of his time and of posterity if he does his duty well, for the state is an indispensable instrument of civilization, making it possible for men to thrive, for cities to spring up, for poets to sing and indeed for society to exist. And so you honor to-day one who deserved the name of statesman in the noblest meaning it can have with us, since it is men like him who keep the idea of representative government from dying out. He was not lacking in the practical touch demanded by the nature of his work, and yet practical as his work was we shall see how finely and firmly he lived up to his ideals.

In order the better to understand what manner of man he was, let us consider the character of the stock from which he sprung. For two centuries before he was born, his ancestors in nearly every line dwelt along the seacoast now included in Maine. It was not one of the great settlements which George Cleve, himself an ancestor of Reed, planted on the shores of Casco Bay, but no other settlement in America can claim a more stirring and dramatic history. Cleve was as masterful a man as ever led out a colony to found a new empire. He was an independent in religion, but his little settlement was not entirely made up of those who believed in his own creed. The Royalist, free-living element among them occasionally became conspicuous and gave themselves some of the pleasures of life, although it is not easy to imagine a narrower range of gayety than that spread before them. After a little time, Massachusetts asserted its title to this coast and with the aid of the whipping-post and the ducking stool planted a civilization here upon the most austere Puritan models. The Cleve settlement was upon a dangerous frontier, with the Indian and Frenchman to the north. More than once during its first century it was all but obliterated in Indian wars. Portland was depopulated and remained a waste place for a generation. The original settlement was almost purely of the Germanic or Anglo-Saxon stock, Puritan chiefly, though with a touch of what was called the Cavalier, and it was augmented by additions from the Massachusetts Puritan and Pilgrim and later by an infusion of the Scotch-Irish and the Huguenot bloods. But it remained decidedly Anglo-Saxon. Two centuries after it had been planted it is doubtful whether a population more purely of the English blood could have been found anywhere, either in the old country or in the new. It was thus of the great imperial race of the world. From one motive or another, that race has spread from its little island nest into the empty lands over all the habitable globe, carrying with it a genius for self-government and planting everywhere free commonwealths. Its instinct for government is so persistent that even when it has emptied the jails of London and sent forth penal colonies, it has after a time, like flowing water, worked itself pure and exhibited again the spirit of orderly government. Sidney Smith was not simply employing the touch of the satirist when he predicted that the time might come when some Botany Bay Tacitus would record the crimes and splendors of an emperor lineally descended from a London pick-pocket.

The men who founded the state of Maine were the choicest specimens of the English race. They were willing to face the perils of the ocean, at that time terrible in reality and more terrible still to the imagination, to brave a rigorous climate, to strive to wring a living from an infertile soil and from the sea and to wage long wars against the red man in order that they might enjoy civil and religious liberty. While the original purity of the stock has been unimpaired, the psychologists of the nation tell us that a new race practically has been evolved from this intense struggle and this new environment, with strong new qualities grafted upon the old.

Reed's first ancestor of his name in this country apparently came to Salem, Massachusetts, about 1630, and the son of this ancestor found his way to Maine. Reed never concerned himself much about his remote pedigree. He accepted himself as he was without a wish to invoke in his behalf the merit of ancestors, content to know the general character of his stock. He once proposed a toast to Maine: settled, as he said, "chiefly by the blood of old England, but always preferring liberty to ancestry." His ancestors, he once remarked, never held any position of great emolument, judging by his own financial condition when he arrived. There can be no doubt, however, of the excellence of the individual lines blended in him, containing as they did the George Cleve and the Massachusetts Puritan and Pilgrim strains. Some of his ancestors were captured or killed in the Indian wars, and another was with Paul Jones when he captured the Serapis. His own father was a sea-captain commanding sailing-vessels in the coasting trade, a calling which required authority and courage.

Reed was very fortunate in his education. In his later years, he declared that he had long thought it the greatest good fortune of his life that he had spent five and one-half years under Master Lyford, a famous teacher of the Portland Boys' High School. After a thorough preparation, he entered Bowdoin College at the age of sixteen. The modern college had not then come into existence, and Bowdoin offered a course containing much Latin, Greek and mathematics, with few or no elective studies, and gave the rigid discipline of the best American colleges at that time. It was a discipline that has bred scholars and poets and statesmen, teaching them how to think and write and speak. At the head of the faculty was Leonard Woods, probably as cultivated and cosmopolitan a president as could be found in any college of that day. He had with him a small band of professors, nearly every one of whom was so distinguished as to be known even to this time outside the circles of his own college. After four years of study in close personal contact with such men, he was graduated, almost the youngest man in a class numbering fifty-five, of whom he was the leader in scholarship in the Senior year and the fifth in average rank for the entire course. Aside from the regular work, he took the prize in writing, was an editor of the college paper and was active in sports and in the social life of the college. We get a fascinating glimpse of him and of his care-free manner in a passage in one of his letters describing a long walk which he took upon a brilliant winter evening, when he would occasionally rest by throwing himself on his back upon high snow-drifts and gaze wonderingly upon the planet Jupiter. Enough is known of his college career to permit us to see his natural and easy growth and the spirit in which he strove to fashion himself in that bright morning time,

—“ere the hot sun count

His dewy rosary on the Eglantine.”

Those were four happy and fruitful years which he passed going in and out beneath the Brunswick elms, and there were few college men of that time who might not have envied him his opportunities for real culture and the manner in which he improved them. Like many another American boy, he was forced to rely somewhat upon his own efforts to meet his college expenses. There is an ideal touch in the circumstance, as if to prefigure his own career, that he was helped by another son of Bowdoin of kindred character who has won honorable place in the history of his country, William Pitt Fessenden. In the letter conveying payment of the full balance of the loan and interest, young Reed gratefully wrote Fessenden: “I have seen enough of the world to know that I might live as long again without finding a man who would do such an act of kindness in so kind a manner.”

In taking account of the special influences which helped to mould his mind and fit him for the work he was to do, we must not overlook his service in the Civil War and his residence in California. He was accustomed afterward to speak lightly of his career of something more than a year as assistant-paymaster in the navy, as indeed he was wont to speak lightly of anything that might seem to increase his own personal importance. It was one of the precepts which he used to impress with a touch of drollery that "we make more progress by owning our faults than by always dwelling on our virtues." He might well have pointed out that when the ship sinks, the paymaster is as likely to go down as is the fighting sailor, but he said the navy meant to him "not the roaring wind and the shrieking shot and shell but smooth water and the most delightful time of my life." The Mississippi river where he saw the most of his service was at that time a scene of unsurpassed dramatic interest and the time spent upon it, whether in fighting or not, broadened his experience greatly, just as his residence in California in the formative days of that community widened the outlook of the future statesman.

His career at the bar was admirable in its training for the public service. It was of the sort to develop whatever talent he had for the law, a talent that was certainly great. In his first five years of practice he established himself so notably that he was made the attorney-general of his state when but thirty years old, the youngest age at which that office has ever been held in Maine. He was attorney-general for three years during a time when the office dealt with a great variety of litigation, some of it as important as could engage the attention of a lawyer. He filled the place with great success. Then for four years he was counsel for the city of Portland. Thus after a dozen busy years in which he maintained himself in the courts against lawyers of eminence, a period long enough to train him thoroughly as a lawyer and not so long as to put his faculties in perpetual slavery to that calling, and after a service in both Houses of the Maine legislature, he was elected to Congress at the age of thirty-seven.

The term of Reed's first Congress began on the day when General Hayes took the oath of office as President, an event which, if it did not inaugurate a new era, emphasized with a good deal of clearness an important transition in our history. It marked the end of state governments supported by national bayonets and witnessed the restoration in form at least of civil government throughout the Union. At the first look, the 4th of March, 1877, appeared to usher in a time of political sterility succeeding an heroic age. We had witnessed so many signal events compressed within a brief period; we had fought among ourselves the greatest of wars; had freed four million slaves and had at once made them, so far as paper could do it, equal self-governing members of our great democracy, and the doctrine of equal rights, both civil and political, had never before in the history of the world been practically applied on so stupendous a scale. After these achievements, we had become politically blasé and the ordinary routine of prosperous government was sure to pall upon the senses. We were attuned to the spectacle of having society abstractly reconstituted every election day according to the most ideal models. The time that was coming in might seem humdrum because it was to succeed so impatient a regime when we strove to attain in a day an ultimate perfection and to experience all the sensations that come to a nation in a very long life-time.

But important questions were pressing themselves forward, not in a dramatic fashion but with the quiet persistency with which natural laws compel attention, serious questions of governmental honesty, of finance, of the standard of value of our money, of taxation—all vitally involving not merely the prosperity but the honor and even the stability of the nation. President Hayes courageously grappled with the new order. Although under the shadow of a clouded title, he won such success as to re-establish his party, and what is of far greater consequence, to deserve the gratitude of the oncoming generation.

It was at the moment of this transition that Reed first took his seat in the House as a Republican. In the general principles of his party he firmly believed. Above all else he was possessed with the passion for human rights which was the noblest heritage of the war. All issues relating to that as well as the supremacy of the central government within its sphere, the war had settled large for him. The House is a forum where, as he afterwards said, "distinction won in other fields of endeavor will gain a man a hearing for the first time but not afterwards." Although he had a brilliant career at the bar and as a member of the Maine legislature, he had established no reputation of the sort that would precede him to Washington. He went there with the ordinary passports of the new member and his career was entirely before him. With his ideal equipment for the work of the House, however, it was inevitable that he should speedily establish himself.

The first real opportunity came in his appointment to the committee to investigate charges of fraud in connection with the presidential election. The manner in which he performed his part of the work attracted the attention of the country. Most of the republican leaders were disqualified from membership by the terms of the resolution and although a new member Reed was appointed. On the other hand, his political opponents were the seasoned veterans of their party. As he said of them, the household troops were ordered up. In a short off-hand speech upon the subject of the investigation, called out by an incautious attack by a member of the opposite party, he first gave the House a touch of his unique qualities as a debater. In that speech he displayed to such advantage his sarcastic humor, his power of repartee, and his force of argument, that he took rank at once as the most formidable debater upon his side of the House.

To trace minutely his course during his service in the House would be to write a history of all the important legislation of that period. I shall refer only to those subjects that clearly overshadowed all others in the contests of that time. We now approach a field which has not yet passed exclusively into the domain of the historian. Some of the political questions of that day are still in issue and others have been so recently removed from politics that the fires yet smoulder near the surface, compelling one to walk with caution.

Upon the questions relating to the standard of our money, no clear line of division separated the parties. Members of each party were to be found upon both sides. Reed has expressed the opinion that a large majority of the American people favored inflation during the administration of President Hayes and that his courageous veto by arresting attention gave them a chance for reflection. Certainly their representatives were ready to pass by large majorities bills for printing more greenbacks and for coining lightweight dollars. The wickedness of the "bloated bond-holder" seemed for the moment to engage the attention of that class of orators never absent in a democratic government who seek to win the suffrages of the people by inflaming them with a sense of fancied wrong. Reed's course from the outset was notably consistent. He stood resolutely for the maintenance of the gold standard. From the time when he opposed the coinage bill of 1878 until the final popular decree in 1896, he was the most potent force in the House of Representatives for maintaining gold as the standard of our money. The device embodied in the Sherman law he was persuaded was necessary to forestall the passage of a free coinage bill, but he strongly supported President Cleveland's effort to repeal that law, and under his leadership the far greater number of his party associates in the House voted for repeal. He gave the President unflinching support throughout the whole of the splendid fight which he made for maintaining the integrity of our money.

As a constitutional result of the war, the black man was counted equally with the white in apportioning representatives among the states, and the suppression of his vote gave to the war the practical result of greatly increasing the political power of the southern white man in the national government. Reed stood by the position of his party in favor of an election law to enable the vote of the colored man to be safely cast and honestly counted in all national elections. The time was still hot with the passions of the war and some of its fiercest parliamentary contests were waged over this question.

The tariff struggle has been a perennial one since the adoption of the Constitution and it was then particularly raging. Five general revisions of the tariff passed the House while Reed was a member of it, two democratic and three republican, although the essential difference between them justified very little of the heat displayed in the controversy. Reed believed in encouraging manufactures, although the argument that seemed most strongly to weigh with him was of a social character and was based upon our higher standard of living, which required a higher wage than in the countries with which the competition was most keen.

As a debater and parliamentary leader he must be accorded high rank. For nearly the entire period of his service, the parties were so evenly balanced in the country that no party could be said to be in control of the government. The House was usually democratic, the Senate republican, while the presidency alternated between the two parties. From 1877 to 1889 all the three parts of the legislative machine were not controlled by the same party at any single time, except for a period of two years. The democratic party, so long victorious before the war, was again reviving, and having control of the great popular branch of the government, the House became the theater of the struggle and it was there that the contest was most bitterly waged for the possession of the government. I doubt if there has been another period of equal length in our history when the House was the scene of so much desperate party warfare, so much fighting of the short-sword order and when there was a more imperative call for the qualities that fit men for intellectual combat. The democratic party was represented in that body by a group of extremely able men, comprehending a wide diversity of talent. In the combination of resources which they presented, it would be difficult to match them at any other time in the history of the House. It had parliamentary leaders and debaters like Carlisle, Randall, Crisp and Turner, orators like Wilson, Cochran and Bryan, and the list of its members possessing a really high order of talent might be much further prolonged. The necessity of the situation required the republicans to keep their strongest man at the front. There are times when the demands of the place are less exacting and some man of fairly respectable talent may be chosen by political intrigue in preference to a stronger man and may successfully go through the forms of leadership. But in this instance the best was none too good, and it is no disparagement of the republican membership to say that when Reed became its leader he was so pre-eminently the man for the place as to stand in a class by himself; and from that time until he left the House sixteen years later, he remained at the head of his party, the longest period that any man has been the leader of a party in either the Senate or the House. Men have been successful at the head of an opposition who have failed in attempting to lead a victorious party. Others have lacked in the fertility of resource necessary to attack who yet with a majority about them could stubbornly conduct a defensive battle. But Reed had the well-rounded qualities that made him equally successful both as minority and majority leader. He is however more interesting as minority leader, because in the evolution of our political institutions it became the custom to make the leader of the majority in the House the Speaker, and the limitations of that office were not so well adapted to his temperament as was the freedom of the floor. For ten years he led the minority, sometimes with a force at his back nearly equal to that of his antagonists and sometimes with a little band behind him outnumbered three to one. It is the simple truth to say that great and varied as was the array of talent against him, he never was over-matched and he never appeared to have all his reserves brought into action.

Let us take some account of his equipment. His appearance was most impressive. Giant as he was in stature he looked every inch a leader. His very look fixed the attention of the House. He was slow and distinct in enunciation, with a powerful and strident voice capable of cutting through the confusion and penetrating to the farthest recesses of the enormous hall. He always used the lower tones of his voice, some of which were of great sweetness. He spoke without visible effort, rarely making a gesture, and a fine, strong light shone from his brilliant eyes, although in moments of great excitement they blazed with a consuming fire.

His mind was a fit companion to his body. He had a remarkable power of statement, and when he was dealing with his opponent's case, instead of stating it first and then overthrowing it, he would often demolish it in the statement itself. "What the House likes best," he once said, "is plain statement, hard-hitting and sense enough to know when one is done." He was able to seize unerringly upon the vital point in a controversy and he would not concern himself over the little issues. He had the good taste to speak simply. He saw things clearly, could express his exact meaning in admirably chosen words and his sentences were without a blemish from the stand-point of form. As to the commonplace shifts of the orator, the balanced periods and the worked-up passages, he never patronized them.

But his pre-eminent quality was his humor, a quality until recent times very little used in public speaking, judging from the examples that have come down to us. Prior to the middle of the nineteenth century, oratory with us seems to have been a desperately serious calling. One would no more look for a joke in one of the approved speeches of that time than in a demonstration of Euclid. And some real humor would certainly mitigate their reading very much. Even that prince of orators, Daniel Webster, would be more widely read if he had not so sternly restrained the sense of humor which he undoubtedly possessed. Reed's humor often showed the finish and perfection of the finest wit, but there were no small barbed arrows in his quiver. It was rather like the body of his argument, the play of heavy artillery, and it could as effectively sweep the field.

His willingness to accept battle was superb. What was said of a famous debater in the British Parliament could truthfully be said of him: "He went out in all weathers"; but the weather that delighted him most was the storm; and no weather seemed so rough as to disturb his coolness and self-control. His speeches will usually be found in the Record just as he delivered them. He did not emulate some of the great orators of former times, not to mention our own, and struggle with an occasion after it had passed by. He had not the habit of withholding his speeches for revision, to clothe them with a rhetoric which he would have spoken, but they were printed the next morning as they had been delivered.

He never wasted words. "Speech," he once said, "dies upon the empty air. Better a pound of fact than a shipload of language." During his service in the House it is doubtful if he made a half dozen speeches as long as a half hour, and the length of the greater number of them would not exceed five minutes. Those short speeches light up the Record and are models of their kind, making the situation clear and bringing the House to a sense of what it was doing.

On two occasions only did his speeches approach two hours in length, one being the closing argument for his side against the Mills tariff bill, and the other, the closing argument against the Wilson bill. Each occasion was the culmination of a long and bitter party controversy. The Mills bill embodied the central policy upon which Cleveland's campaign for re-election in 1888 was to be waged. The tariff was much discussed in those days, and in three successive presidential elections it was the overshadowing issue. It filled the mouths of our statesmen with large figures and their contributions to the "dismal science" were usually in keeping with its name. An ancient tariff speech, of all speeches in the world, is not apt to be the most entertaining reading, but Reed's speech on the Mills bill is worth reading even to-day. There are indeed few Congressional speeches of equal length that will bear reading so well. It has none of the wooden qualities of the spoken essay, no particle of the ornate fustian which so often made the pretentious speech of the last century such a thing of terror, but it is a fighting speech, glowing from beginning to end, full of irony, argument, wit and eloquence, and was equally effective at the moment and when read later in the campaign it was chiefly meant to influence.

The debate upon the Wilson bill took place at the climax of the tariff agitation. It was the dramatic moment of a political battle running through all of Cleveland's contests for the presidency. In the first he was elected, in the next defeated, and at last again victorious, and for the first time supported by both Houses of his own political faith, he was at the head of a party responsible for the passage of a tariff bill, and one was about to be enacted which pleased nobody and which he himself refused to sign. The closing of the debate in the House presented a memorable spectacle, fitly marking the culmination of this long political struggle. The Capitol could scarcely contain the throng, and the great chamber and its galleries were crowded to suffocation. Although the speech of Reed on that day began with the statement that "if anything seems to have been discussed until human nature can bear it no more, it is the tariff," both in its immediate effect and as it is read in the Record, it was worthy of a great occasion and measures up to the best standards of parliamentary eloquence.

I believe that he has not been excelled as a debater by any man ever in the House of Representatives. There have been orators who have given more attention to rhetorical finish, but no man has surpassed him in the history of the House, certainly for three-quarters of a century, in power of condensed statement, in a destructive ridicule and in the stately and even flow of his speech, massive and strong. He appeared to the best advantage in his short speeches. That is not true of some of the other great parliamentary speakers. Take then either of his two longest efforts in the House, to which I have just been referring, that on the Wilson bill or that on the Mills bill. Read it by the side of any other debating speech you may select, either from the House of Commons or the House of Representatives, taking, however, a speech of the modern era, when short-hand reporting had been developed, that you may know you are reading a real speech and not an imaginary oration with the fine outbursts and beautiful periods, the careful result of after-preparation. I believe that Reed will stand the test so far as the reading is concerned. Then if you wish to imagine the immediate effect, remember that his delivery exactly fitted what he said, and that in action he looked the twenty thousand ton battleship with all its range of armament, its great and little guns in full play, and that with his variety and force of attack, he seemed at the time invincible.

Reed as minority leader dealing with the rules was always engaging the other side and putting its leaders to the necessity of using all their wits. No man ever had a better command of the procedure of the House. He played the parliamentary game hard but played it according to the rules and he never sought to embark the House upon revolution.

While as minority leader he was opposed to legislative anarchy, as leader of the majority, he stood equally against legislative impotency. More conspicuously than with any other thing his name is identified with the overthrow of a system which enabled a minority, by refusing to vote, to produce a legislative paralysis and for negative purposes to control the action of the House. Speaker for six years, under the long-established practice of the House he was therefore its leader. He stated with exactness the character of the speakership when he was first chosen. In a speech, none the less admirable because in point of brevity it was at the time probably without parallel upon a like occasion, he said that under our system as developed the duties of his office were both political and parliamentary. "So far as the duties are political, I sincerely hope that they may be performed with a proper sense of what is due to the people of this whole country. So far as they are parliamentary, I hope with equal sincerity that they may be performed with a proper sense of what is due to both sides of this Chamber."

Our speakership undeniably possesses this dual character and the question is often asked why it should have taken on the political aspect, when the Speaker of the British House of Commons is in effect a judicial officer. The chief reason may be found in the difference between our parliamentary systems. In England there is an intermingling of the executive and legislative functions. All the ministers of the Crown are members of the one legislative Chamber or the other. The leading minister in the House of Commons is the leader of that body. He and his colleagues in office direct its affairs and conduct the government under their responsibility to the Commons. When they fail to command a majority they go out of office. But we have no cabinet system. We do indeed have what is called a cabinet, but its members are purely executive subordinates of the President, a species of magnificent head clerks, and are entirely lacking in parliamentary functions. The constitution contemplated separate departments, with Congress in a region by itself passing laws, and the President in his own secluded domain executing them, with an occasional formal message "on the state of the Union." But no great government can be effectively run with the two branches of its central political department only upon formal speaking terms, with the President sending coldly constitutional and polite notes to Congress and the latter in its own good time replying or not as it should see fit to do. To insure that harmony which is essential in the workings of all the parts of such a vast and complex governmental machine, there must be practical ways of reaching an intimate understanding. Through a process of evolution the speakership had come to be an important instrument in supplying the apparent gap left by the constitution between the executive and legislative departments and to put them upon more workable terms. It presented the advantages of a centralized leadership representing in the first instance the popular branch of the legislature and tended to secure a measure of the unity in government secured by the Cabinet system. And as a balance to the President, such a commanding figure on Capitol hill, always responsible to the House and subject to being overruled by it, has operated as a check upon the obvious tendency to autocracy incident to the growth of the government and the centralization of power at Washington.

The central and dramatic event in Reed's speakership was the counting of the quorum. The large number of the quorum required in the House, eight-fold larger than that of the British House of Commons when the difference in the number of members is taken into account, makes it difficult for the party in control to maintain a quorum out of its own membership unless its majority is very large. It had for many years been the settled practice for the minority to attempt to defeat legislation to which they were opposed by abstaining from voting, when they could not accomplish the same result by directly voting against it. Thus the majority had frequently been compelled to abandon legislation. The majority of the House might actually be present but the method of determining its presence had been by the vote and if a majority had not voted upon the roll call business could not proceed. In Reed's first speakership his party had a very small majority. After a roll call upon a party question when less than a quorum of members had responded to their names, although many more were present, he directed the clerk to note the presence of those who were present but had not voted. Thus a quorum was made up and the vote was announced in favor of the proposition which had received a majority of those who had seen fit to vote. His reasons were simple, and they were unanswerable from the constitutional standpoint. If members could be present and refuse to exercise their function, "the provision of the constitution giving the House power to compel attendance of absent members would seem to be entirely nugatory. Inasmuch as the constitution only provided for their attendance, that attendance was enough." This ruling was followed by a parliamentary storm unprecedented in severity in the history of the House. For many hours it was not possible to proceed with the ordinary business on account of the uproar. Members rushed down the aisles, filled the area in front of the Speaker and denounced him with great violence of language as a tyrant and a czar. He held himself calm and unmoved amid the tumult, sustained by the consciousness that he was right and that he was announcing a procedure which the constitution contemplated and the growing demands of the country's business made absolutely necessary.

The Supreme Court subsequently upheld the constitutionality of Reed's ruling but his triumph was to be even more complete. His opponents were formally to sanction it. In a later Congress, when he led the minority and the party in control had returned to the ancient practice, he attacked it with every resource known to parliamentary law and succeeded in demonstrating its unsoundness. His antagonists, although they had a large majority, were unable to furnish a quorum from their own ranks. Reed's party under his lead refrained from voting, and thus for weeks the transaction of business was made impossible. And the men who had vehemently denounced him were compelled at last to adopt the principle of his ruling and affirm the practice that if a quorum is actually present, the House can transact business whether members vote or not. That has ever since been the law of the House.

It required courage of the highest order to overturn the precedents of a century made by all parties, and previously assented to by himself, and to establish a principle so correct and in accordance with common sense. But he was not disturbed upon the question of consistency. His dictum upon the subject proves that. "I do not promise," he said, "to give wisdom of adamant. I will give them honestly what my opinion is at the time; they must take the chances of its being for eternity."

It has required a man of unusual quality to direct our great popular assembly in the days since the Civil War when the business of the government has grown so enormously, when the pressure from private interests has vastly increased and when partisanship has usually run so high. It is no light task to moderate that great turbulent body and to maintain orderly procedure. As Speaker, Reed fitly embodied the dignity of the House and it never had a presiding officer who more inflexibly and fairly administered its rules.

No greater Speaker ever presided over the House. Henry Clay, who directed not merely the affairs of the House but to a large extent of the country during his speakership, was constantly taking the floor. He made a dozen or more speeches at a single session. I am not aware that during his whole speakership, Reed took the floor either in the House or in Committee of of the Whole. He held himself austere in reserve. His rulings were models of just expression and possessed a weight and condensed power which it is difficult to match. He had the courage calmly to rise to great occasions and with a heroism only equalled by his insight he established the greatest land-mark in the parliamentary law of the House.

Just at the end of his public career, a new set of issues were coming forward. He was opposed to the annexation of the Sandwich Islands, firmly believing that it was for the interest of the republic to remain a continental power and that it would contribute most effectively to the cause of good government throughout the world by furnishing the example of a well-governed democratic state and by scrupulous respect for the rights of weaker peoples. He was equally opposed to the Spanish War and used the power of his office, so far as he properly could, to prevent both the annexation and the war. That power was great, but no man knew better than he that the Speaker was far from omnipotent, that he could only lead where the House was willing to follow, and his efforts were unavailing. The war was begun for the avowed purpose of putting an end to a condition in the western hemisphere which was within our traditional sphere of action, but the important question it bequeathed to us was whether we should become an Asiatic power and take upon ourselves the government of populations almost under the equator in the seas of the Orient. Reed's political education, the practice of his whole life and his view of the fundamental principle of the American commonwealth made his position upon this question inevitable. Long before the Philippines appeared upon our horizon, he declared in a speech in the House, "that the best government of which a people is capable is a government which they establish for themselves. With all its imperfections, with all its short-comings, it is always better adapted to them than any other government, even though invented by wiser men." The idea that America should violate its traditional principle of self-government and enter upon the work of governing subject states, he hated with all the fierce hatred of a vanishing time. It seemed to him like abandoning the principle which made her unique among the nations. He was profoundly stirred by our taking on "the last colonial curse of Spain," but it had been done by a treaty solemnly ratified by the Senate, and he had come to the parting of the ways. His re-election to the speakership appeared certain, and that office, he once declared had but one superior and no peer. His mind had been never so ripe. But he was heartsore at the prospect of following the new and opposite line and he determined to retire to private life. To his near friend, Asher Hinds, he said, "I have tried perhaps not always successfully to make the acts of my public life accord with my conscience and I cannot now do this thing." And so he wrote his touching farewell letter to his constituents and withdrew from the public service.

One would fail to do justice to Reed if he did not speak of his brilliancy and charm in conversation. His wise, bantering and witty talk was the life of any social group in which he happened to be placed. There was no arrogance in his manner, he never took possession of any company, as social autocrats are apt to do, but none the less he was by common consent sure to take the lead. His sententious witticisms became the talk of the town and were repeated from mouth to mouth. It is unfortunate that there was not some Boswell to take down his conversation and that so many of his brilliant sayings have perished. His wit was ingrained in the substance of his style and was shown alike in conversation and in off-hand speaking. He often united with it a homely common sense philosophy strongly resembling that of Dr. Franklin and a way of putting it that reminds one of Sidney Smith.

In attempting to quote from him, it is equally difficult to know where to begin and where to stop, and after one is done he feels sure there are better specimens left. But I will venture a few short examples which may show something of the touch of his wit and philosophy.

Bantering a House of the opposite party for doing nothing but talk, he said: "It presents the dead level of a Dutch landscape with all its wind-mills but without a trace of its beauty and fertility."

Of his own minority, he said: "They behaved with gentleness and modesty, partly because they were very good men and partly because there were very few of them."

And again of a member who was a skillful lawyer, he said: "There is no man in five kingdoms abler to dig a pit for a witness and sweetly coax him into it."

Complimenting the honesty of an opponent to whom he was replying, he added: "Such is the direct nature of his mind that there is no man so capable of thoroughly exposing the weakness of a bad position that he happens to occupy."

This is his homely version of "omne ignotum pro magnifico," the principle in human nature which causes the gold brick industry to flourish in politics and elsewhere: "Everything we do not know anything about always looks big. The human creature is imaginative. If he sees a tail disappearing over a fence, he images the whole beast and usually images the wrong beast. . . . Whenever we take a trip into the realms of fancy, we see a good many things that never were."

Speaking of a panic in Wall Street which squeezed the inflation out of values, he said: "Water flowed down both sides of the street."

Sometimes the world moves slowly. "It took four thousand years of pagan and fifteen centuries of Christian civilization to produce a two-pronged fork and another century to bring it into use."

"We endure filth diseases thousands of years and call them visitations from God, and when some one proposes the remedy, we listen in early ages with the horror suitable to greet a man who wishes to interfere with God's methods in the universe."

"Never expect toleration from a crowd that has other views and has them vividly."

"Wrong is never so weak as in its hour of triumph."

"The alternation of good times and hard times antedates the pyramids."

"If we ever learn to treat the living with the tenderness with which we instinctively treat the dead, we shall then have a civilization well worth distributing."

"That is one of the laws of God working for his children, and compared with one of your laws of Congress, it is as a Leviathan to a clam."

The description of the view from Cushing's Island across Portland harbor, in which he takes you from the Portland of to-day to the Portland of the time of Cleve's landing, will serve as an example of a different vein, showing his accuracy as an observer and his skill as a painter of a scene. "The long slope of grassy verdure varied by the darker foliage of the trees spreads wide to the water's edge. Then begins the bright sparkle of the summer sea, that many-twinkling smile of ocean, that countless laughter of the waves which has lighted up the heart of man centuries since Eschylus died, and centuries before he lived. Across the sunlit waters, dotted with the white sails or seamed with the bubbling foam of the steamers' track, past the wharves, bristling with masts and noisy with commerce, the gaze falls upon the houses sloping quickly upward in the center and becoming more and more embowered in trees as they climb the hills at either end. Following the tall spires the eye loses itself in the bright blue sky beyond. . . . If you shut your eyes and let the lofty spires disappear, the happy homes glisten out of sight, and the wharves give place to a curving line of shelving, pebbly beach; if you imagine the bright water unvexed by traffic, the tall peninsula covered with forests and bushy swamps, with the same varied expanse of island and of sea, and the whole scene undisturbed by any sound save the clanging cries of innumerable birds and water fowl, you will be looking upon Machigonne as it appeared to George Cleve."

But beyond his brilliancy as a debater, his resplendent wit and his skill as a parliamentary leader, his title to remembrance rests upon his quality as a statesman. He had a great ambition, but it was not great enough to lead him to surrender any principle of government which he deemed vital. Like Webster, like Clay and others of our most conspicuous statesmen, he was disappointed at not reaching the Presidency, but he could fitly aspire to the office for he was of the fibre and nurture out of which great presidents are made. He probably would not have been a continuously popular president, but our great presidents never have been. He had that supreme quality which was seen in Washington breasting the popular anti-British feeling and asserting against France our diplomatic independence; in Lincoln bearing the burden of unsuccessful battles and holding back the sentiment for emancipation until the time was ripe for freedom; in Grant facing the popular clamor and vetoing inflation, and in Cleveland alienating his party while he persisted in as righteous and heroic a battle as was ever waged by a president.

A great nation cannot make up its mind in a moment. What first appeals to its fancy is not likely to appeal to its final judgment, and the severest test of the disinterestedness of the statesman under our system is his readiness to risk unpopularity and defeat in order to protect the people from their first impulse and give them an opportunity to form a real opinion. Reed's faith was in what he called "the deliberate judgment of the people," but he declared that "the sudden and unreflecting judgment of the noisy who are first heard is quite as often a voice from the underworld." This distinction is vital since the cause of democracy has nothing to hope from the statesman who weakly yields to the temptation always to be popular and who panders to the noisy passions of the moment rather than consults the real interests of the people. Reed recognized no divinity in an unthinking clamor, whether raised by one man or a great mass of men. The people could no more depend on inspiration to guide them in performing their public duties than in their private affairs. In each case, reflection and work were equally necessary. He showed his reverence for representative government by the calm dignity with which he bore himself during more than two decades of service. He was sometimes compelled to struggle to maintain himself but he scorned to make the struggle upon demagogue lines or to swerve from the straight path upon which he moved with so much majesty. He was not priggish up with the commonplace sort of greatness, with a padded and theatric make-up staged to strike the imaginations of little men or to set wagging the puffing pens of little writers. He was no self-advertiser and ran no press bureaus to trumpet his real or imaginary virtues. He sought no mere noisy and ephemeral fame but he lived upon a plane visible at history's perspective and he grandly wove his life into the texture of his time.

And so you rear this statue. And you do well to rear it for, although his memory is one of the treasures of the whole country, it was you who gave him to the nation. He was the product of the sky and soil of Maine, lightened by her sunshine and hardened by her storms. As a representative acts well or ill, he reflects credit or discredit upon those who have chosen him. By this test how signally he honored you. But you equally honored yourselves when, amid all the shifting popular vagaries and the following of false gods, you permitted yourselves to be guided by the better genius of popular government and kept this heroic figure for so long a time in the service of his country. And when he returned his commission to you, he could truthfully say as he proudly said: "No sail has been trimmed for any breeze or any doubtful flag ever flown." That noble phrase gives the keynote to his character as a statesman. The only colors he was willing to fight under were those that represented his own principles. He never sailed just for the sake of sailing but to make progress upon a straight course. He did not take his inspiration and direction from the winds but from the stars.

Immediately after the delivery of Judge Symonds' opening address the ceremony of unveiling the statue proceeded. The string was drawn by Thomas Reed Balentine, infant grandson of Thomas Brackett Reed, his mother, Mrs. Katharine Reed Balentine, wife of Captain Arthur T. Balentine, of the U. S. Coast Artillery, assisting him.

When the fine statue was thrown open to the view of the assembled multitude Judge Symonds said :

I am sure I repeat the hope and prayer of all when I say, may the beautiful boy live to appreciate better than he can now the fine part he has taken to-day in the unveiling of his grandfather's statue.

The sculptor was then introduced by the President of the Association, saying :

I now have the distinguished honor to introduce to you the man of genius, at whose touch this noble statue has sprung into life, by whose patient, skillful hand it has been wrought to the last perfection in portraiture and in art, the young and brilliant American sculptor, Mr. Burr C. Miller, of Wilkes Barre, Pennsylvania, resident in Paris, France, where the work has been executed.

The President of the Association then addressed the Mayor of the City, and he replied, as follows:

Mr. Mayor: In the name and in behalf of the Thomas Brackett Reed Memorial Association, by direction of its Executive Committee, I now commit to the sacred keeping of the City of Portland, the city of his birth and of his ancestry, with which his great life is forever associated, to which his name will always impart "charm and illustration," this memorial statue of Thomas Brackett Reed.

Mr. President: In the name of the city of Portland I accept this memorial statue of Thomas Brackett Reed, to be kept and maintained in perpetual memory of him whom it represents. In no sense a burden, this obligation will be fulfilled by the present and succeeding generations with loving care and faithful service.

It has been said, perhaps with some truth, that the citizens of Portland have failed, in many cases, to fittingly honor their fellow citizens whose character and life work had elevated them to the level of national prominence. This monument to Mr. Reed bears witness that his fellow citizens fully appreciate the great services he rendered his country and the magnificent manhood of the man. And we certainly are not derelict in our duty when we raise this monument of bronze and granite in honor of this man of our generation who stands out pre-eminent as a leader, to whom we are deeply indebted for giving us in his own personality an example of the best and finest type of American citizenship.

It is not my purpose to attempt to review the story of Mr. Reed's life, that has been ably and eloquently done by the gentlemen who have preceded me; but I believe that history will signalize him as one possessing in a very high degree, that sure characteristic of all truly great men—the courage of his convictions. To him we can well apply the words of the Latin poet:

- “Not the wild fury of his fellow citizens ordering him to do evil;
- “Nor the look of a threatening tyrant;
- “Nor the stormy south wind ruling the unquiet Adriatic;
- “Nor the mighty hand of Jupiter wielding his thunderbolts;
- “Can shake in his settled purpose the man who is just and steadfast in his determination;
- “If the cracking heavens fall they will strike him unmoved by fear.”

Envy, political hostility, misrepresentation and personal abuse that all public men have to undergo, are now buried forever, and as the rays of the setting sun fall upon the surface of a stream, to gold converting one by one the ripples of that flowing river, so we, filled with admiration for him, for what he was and what he stood for, as we contemplate this statue, see from beneath the bronze appearing, the pure gold of his character, his integrity and his ability.

At the close of the delivery of the oration in State Street Church the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Asa Dalton, D. D., of Portland.

OFFICERS AND COMMITTEES

OF THE

THOMAS BRACKETT REED MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT.

JOSEPH W. SYMONDS, Portland, Me.

VICE PRESIDENTS.

AUGUSTUS G. PAINE, New York, N. Y.

GEORGE M. SEIDERS, Portland, Me.

WINTHROP MURRAY CRANE, Dalton, Mass.

HENRY DEERING, Portland, Me.

SECRETARY.

FRANK D. MARSHALL, Portland, Me.

TREASURER.

GEORGE W. BEYER, Portland, Me.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Joseph W. Symonds, (Ex-Officio.)

John C. Small,	Augustus G. Paine,
Asher C. Hinds,	Luther B. Roberts,
George M. Seiders,	Henry Deering,
George E. Bird,	James P. Baxter.

SPECIAL SUB-COMMITTEE ON DESIGN.

Augustus G. Paine,	Joseph W. Symonds,
John Carroll Perkins,	Henry Deering.

COMMITTEE ON UNVEILING THE STATUE.

Augustus G. Paine.

COMMITTEE ON DECORATIONS, BADGES AND TICKETS.

Asher C. Hinds.

RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

George E. Bird,	William L. Putnam,
James P. Baxter,	Augustus G. Paine.

COMMITTEE ON INVITATIONS.

George M. Seiders,	Franklin C. Payson,
Asher C. Hinds,	Charles McCarthy, Jr.,
Seth L. Larrabee.

COMMITTEE ON SETTING MONUMENT.

Henry Deering,	Edward C. Jordan,
Frank D. Marshall,	Frederick O. Conant.

COMMITTEE ON ENTERTAINMENT.

John C. Small,	Frederick O. Conant,
Frederic E. Boothby,	Seth C. Gordon,
Herbert J. Brown.

COMMITTEE ON GENERAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Luther B. Roberts,	William L. Cobb,
Frank D. Marshall,	Charles F. Flagg,
George W. Beyer,	Herbert Payson,
E. H. Nickerson.

CONTRIBUTORS.

Amos L. Allen,	Alfred, Me.
Charles C. Adams,	Portland, Me.
Horace Anderson,	" "
Fred E. Allen,	" "
Thomas Asbury, Jr.,	" "
J. F. Albion,	" "
Fred J. Allen,	Sanford, Me.
Charles H. Adams,	Limerick, Me.
Charles T. Ames,	Westbrook, Me.
William F. Aldrich,	Aldrich, Ala.
John D. Archbold,	New York, N. Y.
S. F. Bearce,	Woodfords, Me.
William W. Brown,	Portland, Me.
George W. Beyer,	" "
George E. Bird,	" "
William M. Bradley,	" "
Frederic E. Boothby,	" "
W. H. Brownson,	" "
Harry Butler,	" "
Brunel-Higgins Shoe Co.,	" "
F. S. Blanchard,	Cumberland Center, Me.
Henry C. Blanchard,	" " "
Henry C. Brewer,	Freeport, Me.
A. H. Berry Shoe Co.,	Portland, Me.
Herbert J. Brown,	" "
Eugene L. Bodge,	" "
F. O. Bailey & Co.,	" "

Edwin C. Burleigh,	Augusta, Me.
Nathaniel A. Brown,	Westbrook, Me.
Frank S. Black,	Troy, N. Y.
James P. Baxter,	Portland, Me.
Thurston S. Burns,	Westbrook, Me.
Joseph F. Bodwell,	Hallowell, Me.
Cornelius N. Bliss,	New York, N. Y.
Thomas A. Buckner,	" " "
Botany Worsted Mills,	Passaic, N. J.
Arthur E. Craig,	Portland, Me.
John S. Clark,	Naples, Me.
Charles W. Carr,	Portland, Me.
Lyman M. Cousens,	" "
Charles S. Chase,	" "
Grover Cleveland,	Princeton, N. J.
Elisha W. Conley,	Portland, Me.
William L. Cobb,	" "
Mary J. E. Clapp,	" "
Charles Cook,	" "
George M. Curtis,	Clinton, Ia.
Robert G. Cousins,	Tipton, Ia.
E. Childs,	Cumberland Center, Me.
A. S. Chase,	" " "
Edward B. Cook,	Portland, Me.
F. N. Calderwood,	" "
James Cunningham,	" "
George O. K. Cram,	" "
Horatio Clark,	" "
A. F. Cox & Son,	" "

Fred O. Conant,	Portland, Me.
William T. Cobb,	Rockland, Me.
Cyrus H. K. Curtis,	Philadelphia, Pa.
Andrew Carnegie,	New York, N. Y.
Winthrop Murray Crane,	Dalton, Mass.
H. W. Cannon,	New York, N. Y.
W. Burke Cockran,	" " "
J. P. Cobb,	" " "
W. N. Caldwell	Holyoke, Mass.
William N. Cohen,	New York, N. Y.
David S. Cowles,	" " "
Herbert S. Carpenter,	" " "
Richard Campion,	Philadelphia, Pa.
Cyrus Currier & Sons,	Newark, N. J.
California Cotton Mills Co.,	Oakland, Cal.
Frank E. Davis,	Portland, Me.
Asa Dalton,	" "
George F. Duncan,	" "
Charles F. Dunlap,	" "
Charles B. Dalton,	" "
Guy Davis,	" "
Henry Deering,	" "
James L. Dunn,	Cumberland Center, Me.
Dow & Pinkham,	Portland, Me.
Roswell F. Doten,	" "
George A. Dow,	" "
Fred. N. Dow,	" "
W. K. Dana,	Westbrook, Me.
W. L. Daggett & Co.,	Portland, Me.

William Deering,	Chicago, Ill.
Thomas Dolan,	Philadelphia, Pa.
John T. Devine,	Washington, D. C.
Henry C. Davis,	New York, N. Y.
George A. Draper,	Hopedale, Mass.
John Dalzell,	Pittsburg, Pa.
Dempster & Place,	Gloversville, N. Y.
Ray P. Eaton,	Brunswick, Me.
Harry B. Eddy,	Portland, Me.
Walter C. Emerson,	" "
Edward S. Everett,	" "
George T. Edwards,	" "
Eastman Bros. & Bancroft,	" "
D. L. Einstein,	New York, N. Y.
Earl & Wilson,	" " "
Francis Fessenden,	Portland, Me.
Jed. F. Fanning,	" "
M. P. Frank,	" "
George L. Fogg,	" "
Charles S. Fobes,	" "
George C. Frye,	" "
Charles F. Flagg,	" "
Mrs. Charles F. Flagg,	" "
Mrs. M. C. Farrington,	" "
Thomas J. Foster,	Westbrook, Me.
Henry W. Foster,	" "
Wallace T. Foote, Jr.,	Pt. Henry, N. Y.
William H. Gray,	Portland, Me.
Goodall Worsted Co.,	Sanford, Me.

Frederic Henry Gerrish,	Portland, Me.
C. W. T. Goding,	“ “
Hanno W. Gage,	“ “
Henry C. Gilson,	“ “
Byron Greenough & Co.,	“ “
J. E. Goold Estate,	“ “
Dr. Seth C. Gordon,	“ “
Richard Guenther,	Germany.
Wm. H. Grundy & Co.,	Philadelphia, Pa.
Frank Gilbert,	Waterford, N. Y.
Thomas B. Haskell,	So. Portland, Me.
Edward C. Hersey,	Portland, Me.
George S. Hobbs,	“ “
Asher C. Hinds,	“ “
James C. Hamlen,	“ “
W. H. Hobbs,	“ “
Charles O. Haskell,	“ “
Charles C. Harmon,	“ “
Frederick Hale,	“ “
Edward Hills Son & Co.,	New York, N. Y.
Herbert A. Harmon,	Portland, Me.
Oscar H. Hersey,	“ “
Edward A. Hay,	“ “
F. H. Hazelton,	“ “
Charles M. Hay,	“ “
Charles Hamlin,	Bangor, Me.
John F. Hill,	Augusta, Me.
Oren Hooper Sons,	Portland, Me.
J. Manchester Haynes,	Augusta, Me.

Haskell Silk Company,	Westbrook, Me.
Herbert M. Heath,	Augusta, Me.
Clarence Hale,	Portland, Me.
Robert R. Hitt,	Mt. Morris, Ill.
Thomas H. Hubbard,	New York, N. Y.
F. C. Huyck & Sons,	Albany, N. Y.
William S. Hawk,	New York, N. Y.
Darius H. Ingraham,	Portland, Me.
Milton A. Jewell,	" "
Fritz H. Jordan,	" "
E. E. Jordan,	" "
Edward C. Jones,	" "
Henry M. Jones,	" "
Mr. & Mrs. Edward C. Jordan,	" "
George F. Judkins,	" "
Rufus K. Jordan,	Westbrook, Me.
Winthrop Jordan,	Portland, Me.
I. W. Jacobson,	New York, N. Y.
Jeffrey Mfg. Co.,	Columbus, Ohio.
Fred H. King,	Portland, Me.
A. A. Kendall,	" "
J. A. Kendall,	" "
Alfred King,	" "
H. A. Kelley,	" "
Darwin P. Kingsley,	New York, N. Y.
Kursheedt Mfg. Co.,	" " "
Charles F. Libby,	Portland, Me.
Seth L. Larrabee,	" "
Charles E. Littlefield,	Rockland, Me.

R. M. Lewson,	Portland, Me.
Frank M. Low,	“ “
R. D. Libby,	“ “
Fred F. Lord,	“ “
Harriet A. Libby,	“ “
Margaret A. Libby,	“ “
Ellen H. Libby,	“ “
Adam P. Leighton,	“ “
Isidore W. Leighton,	“ “
J. R. Libby Co.,	“ “
W. W. Lamb,	Cumberland Mills, Me.
Alexander T. Laughlin,	Portland, Me.
L. N. Littauer,	New York, N. Y.
Charles McCarthy, Jr.,	Portland, Me.
Frank D. Marshall,	“ “
Maine Alpaca Company,
by Lewis B. Goodall, Treas.,	Sanford, Me.
Louville H. Merrill,	Cumberland Center, Me.
Fred W. Mayberry,	Portland, Me.
Seth M. Milliken,	New York, N. Y.
Mary W. Milliken,	Portland, Me.
Augustus F. Moulton,	“ “
L. A. Mercier,	“ “
Francis T. Miller,	“ “
J. W. Magruder,	“ “
W. P. Millay,	“ “
J. C. Merrill,	“ “
Edward S. Marshall,	York, Me.
Chas. M. Moses,	Portland, Me.

Robert McArthur,	Biddeford, Me.
Joseph F. Morgan,	Dubuque, Ia.
Charles A. Moses,	Cumberland Mills, Me.
Joseph E. Merrill,	Newton, Mass.
George B. Morrill,	Portland, Me.
John F. A. Merrill,	“ “
John A. McCall,	New York, N. Y.
Samuel W. McCall,	Winchester, Mass.
Levi P. Morton,	New York, N. Y.
Thomas L. Manson,	“ “ “
George B. McClellan,	“ “ “
E. L. Munn,	Holyoke, Mass.
Samuel Mather,	Cleveland, Ohio.
Anson G. McCook,	New York, N. Y.
John Maddock & Sons,	Trenton, N. J.
Edward A. Noyes,	Portland, Me.
New York Knife Co.,	New York, N. Y.
Charles H. Nettleton,	Derby, Conn.
George C. Owen,	Portland, Me.
E. B. Osgood,	Cumberland Center, Me.
J. B. O'Neill,	Portland, Me.
George T. Oliver,	Pittsburg, Pa.
Benjamin B. Odell, Jr.,	New York, N. Y.
Thomas Oakes,	“ “ “
City of Portland,	Portland, Me.
Stephen C. Perry,	“ “
Henry C. Peabody,	“ “
Barrett Potter,	Brunswick, Me.
William N. Prince & Co.,	Portland, Me.

George D. Perkins,	Sioux City, Ia.
Mrs. J. E. Palmer,	Portland, Me.
Henry B. Pennell,	“ “
Palmer Shoe Co.,	“ “
James W. Parker,	“ “
Franklin C. Payson,	“ “
H. M. Payson & Co.,	“ “
Paris Flouring Co.,	“ “
Mr. & Mrs. Clarence W. Peabody,	“ “
Leon K. Paine,	Cumberland Mills, Me.
William L. Putnam,	Portland, Me.
Augustus G. Paine,	New York, N. Y.
George W. Perkins,	“ “ “
I. E. Palmer,	Middletown, Conn.
Charles H. Prescott,	Biddeford, Me.
John Carroll Perkins,	Portland, Me.
Susan P. Reed,	“ “
William W. Roberts,	“ “
John B. Reed,	“ “
Luther B. Roberts,	“ “
Percy H. Richardson,	“ “
Edward C. Reynolds,	“ “
Albert G. Rollins,	“ “
H. H. Ricker,	“ “
W. W. Rowe,	Cumberland Center, Me.
C. H. Robinson,	Portland, Me.
Charles H. Redlon,	“ “
Rowell Bros.,	“ “
George W. Ray,	Norwich, N. Y.

H. H. Rogers,	New York, N. Y.
Jordan J. Rollins,	" " "
Norman B. Ream,	" " "
Edmund D. Randolph,	" " "
John A. Roeblings Sons Co.,	Trenton, N. J.
Edwin Smith,	Thomaston, Me.
H. W. Shaylor,	Portland, Me.
Sanford Mills,	Sanford, Me.
John C. Small,	Portland, Me.
Joseph W. Symonds,	" "
George M. Seiders,	" "
Leroy S. Sanborn,	" "
Neal D. Smith,	" "
E. P. Staples,	" "
James Hopkins Smith,	" "
J. E. Stevens,	" "
Sewall C. Strout,	" "
George C. Shaw Co.,	" "
Southworth Bros.,	" "
F. R. Sweetser,	Cumberland Center, Me.
Dr. & Mrs. George B. Swasey,	Portland, Me.
Hugh A. Sweeney,	" "
George H. Smith,	Waterboro, Me.
Thomas P. Smith,	Westbrook, Me.
Ruel Small,	Portland, Me.
Bellamy Storer,	Cincinnati, Ohio.
George R. Sheldon,	New York, N. Y.
Abraham Seligsberg,	" " "
F. M. Smith,	" " "

Levi Turner,	Portland, Me.
Frank P. Tibbetts,	“ “
Elias Thomas,	“ “
Jeremiah W. Tabor,	“ “
Edward F. Tompson,	“ “
Talbot, Brooks & Ayer,	“ “
O. S. Thomes,	Cumberland Center, Me.
Ernest True,	Portland, Me.
Jabez True,	“ “
Norman True,	“ “
Benjamin Thompson,	“ “
W. W. Thomas,	Stockholm, Sweden.
Charles H. Trefethen,	South Portland, Me.
H. F. Taintor Mfg. Co.,	New York, N. Y.
C. A. Van Rensselaer,	“ “ “
Harry R. Virgin,	Portland, Me.
Fred Vilmar,	New York, N. Y.
Robert T. Whitehouse,	Portland, Me.
George F. West,	“ “
George H. Weeks,	South Portland, Me.
Richard Webb,	Portland, Me.
Horace F. Webb,	“ “
Robert L. Whitcomb,	“ “
Benjamin G. Ward,	“ “
Franklin A. Wilson,	Bangor, Me.
J. L. Watson,	Portland, Me.
Scott Wilson,	“ “
Frederick Walker,	“ “
Stephen H. Weeks,	“ “

Edward B. Winslow,
C. B. Woodman Sons,
John E. Warren,
J. H. Walker,
George Peabody Wetmore,
F. S. Witherbee,
Wayne Knitting Mills,
Eugene H. Yorke,

Portland, Me.
Westbrook, Me.
“ “
Worcester, Mass.
Newport, R. I.
New York, N. Y.
Fort Wayne, Ind,
Portland, Me.

2284-C
11

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 794 245 1

